[Note. The OE. treppe, træppe, and MFlem. trappe, WFlem. trap, trapp, are generally held to be orig. either the same word as MDu. and MLG. trappe, 'stair, flight of steps, step', or a derivative of the same verbal stem trap-* (the non-nasalized original of trampan* to tread, LG. trabben), for the supposed reason that a 'trap' was originally something laid for a beast to tread or step upon, and thus to be either caught by a gin or snare, or precipitated into a deep pit (cf. PITFALL). But it is difficult to conceive trappe, treppe used at once in the general sense 'stair or step', and in the very specific one of 'trap, snare, gin'. It has also to be noticed that it is only in MDu. or rather MFlem. that the word is known in both senses: for in OE. (and Eng. generally, down to 18th c.) trappe, trap had (like the Romanic trappa) only the sense of 'device for catching, gin, snare', while MLG. trappe, treppe, and thence mod. Scandinavian languages, have only the sense 'stair' or 'step of a stair'. (OHG. has a single instance of trapa wk. fem. as a gloss to L. laqueo, but this rather looks like an adoption or re-adoption from med.L.) The actual relation of these words or senses is thus very obscure.]

[Note. It is clear that 14th c. trap and trappure (later TRAPPER sb.[1]) correspond to OF. drap and drapure. The question is how these F. words in dr- have tr- in Eng. This may have been an Eng. change, due to influence of TRAP in other senses. But the trap form may have existed in Anglo-Fr. or even in Fr. dialects. Du Cange has trapus (one example) for med.L. drappus; Pg. and Sp. have trapo 'clout, rag', formerly 'cloth'; also trapero (draper), traperia, trapajo; med. (Anglo-) L. had trappatura, the ordinary equivalent of trappure, OF. trappeire: see TRAPPER sb.[1].]

Trapezium (trăpēˈziŭm). Pl. trapezia, -iums. [a. mod.L. trapezium, ad. Gr. τραπέζιον, dim. of τράπεζα table, in geometry used by Euclid in the general sense (see 1 below), by Proclus (ed. Friedlein, p. 414) in sense 1 b. (The early Latin editions of Euclid 1482–1516 have not trapezium, but the Arabic helmaripha; trapezium is in the Basle ed. of 1546.)

With Euclid (c300 B.C.) τραπέζιον included all quadrilateral figures except the square, rectangle, rhombus, and rhomboid into the trapezia (τράπεζα) it did not enter. But Proclus, who wrote Commentaries on the First Book of Euclid's Elements A.D. 450, retained the name τραπέζιον only for quadrilaterals having two sides parallel, subdividing these into the τραπέζιον ἰσοσκελές, isosceles trapezium, having the two non-parallel sides (and the angles at their bases) equal, and σκαληνὸν τραπέζιον, scalene trapezium, in which these sides and angles are unequal. For quadrilaterals having no sides parallel, Proclus introduced the name τραπεζοειδὲς (‖ Trapezoid. This nomenclature is retained in all the continental languages, and was universal in England till late in the 18th century, when the application of the terms was transposed, so that the figure which Proclus and modern geometers of other nations call specifically a trapezium (F. trapèze, Ger. trapez, Du. trapezium, It. trapezio) became with most English writers a trapezoid, and the trapezoid of Proclus and other nations a trapezium. This changed sense of trapezoid is given in Hutton's Mathematical Dictionary, 1795, as 'sometimes' used—he does not say by whom; but he himself unfortunately adopted and used it, and his Dictionary was doubtless the chief agent in its diffusion. Some geometers however continued to use the terms in their original sense, and since c 1875 this is the prevalent use.]

Rom. trepāliāre*, deriv. of trepālium (A.D. 582 in Du Cange), an instrument or engine of torture (prob. f. L. trēs, tria three + pālus stake, being so named from its structure). The etymological sense was thus 'to put to torture, torment', passing at an early stage into those of 'afflict, vex, trouble, harass, weary'. Through the refl. sense 'to trouble, afflict, or weary oneself', came the intrans. 'to toil, work hard, labour'. Thence also (as is generally thought) the verbal sbs. OF. travail m. and travaille f., ME. travail, -aile: see TRAVAIL, sb.]

The sense-development has not followed the same course in French and in English. Thus English has not developed the simple sense 'work', for which the OE. word has lived on. On the other hand, French has not evolved the sense 'journey' = F. voyager, which appeared early in English, and has become the main sense in English, and is differentiated by the spelling TRAVEL, while the more original senses, so far as they continue in use, retain the earlier spelling TRAVAIL.]

2. Law.

In old English law treason was either High Treason, an offence against the king's majesty or the safety of the commonwealth, or Petit or Petty Treason, an offence committed against a subject. Petit Treason is now punished only as murder, and High Treason is usually styled simply treason. Many acts of High Treason are now treated as Treason-felony.

a. High Treason or Treason proper: Violation by a subject of his allegiance to his sovereign or to the state.

In 1795 the offence was extended to actual or contemplated use of force to make the king change his counsels, or to intimidate either or both of the Houses of Parliament. But see treason-felony 4 b.

Treasure found* (see b), i. e. anything of the nature of treasure which any one finds; spec. in English Law: Treasure (gold or silver, money, plate, or bullion) found hidden in the ground or other place, the owner of which is unknown.

In original use a merely descriptive phrase, of general application. But from an early period a distinction arose; treasure which had been lost (and not claimed), or voluntarily abandoned (of which the amount was naturally small and inconsiderable) was allowed to be kept by the first finder; while that which had been certainly or presumably hidden, was claimed by the Crown. This practically included all ancient treasure, and to this the name treasure trove was specifically restricted. To encourage the giving up of such treasure, when found, and to prevent the destruction of valuable antiquities, the finder now receives from the Crown four-fifths or nine-tenths of the value. 3. The department of state which controls the collection, management, and expenditure of the public revenue; spec. that of the United Kingdom; also that of the United States.

The office of Lord High Treasurer of Great Britain and Ireland is now discharged by a Treasury Board of Commissioners, the First Lord of the Treasury (who is usually, though not always, Prime Minister), the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and junior Lords not more that five in number, who act as Treasury whips. The actual head of the department is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is assisted in his duties by the Financial Secretary in the House of Commons, and by the Permanent Secretary and his staff in the Treasury. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury is the chief whip of the party in office.

All money raised by taxation or otherwise accruing to the Government is paid into the Consolidated Fund, the Exchequer account at the Bank of England. Money cannot be paid out of this account without requisitions and orders from the Treasury, authorized by votes of the House of Commons, and sanctioned by the Comptroller and Auditor General.

Bread of trete (AF. pain de traytie, med. (Anglo-)L. panis de trete, treit), also simply trayt, the second lowest and cheapest quality of bread specified in the Statute of Bread and Ale, 51 Hen. III, 1266; the name remained in use down to the 15th c.

Also discussed by the legal antiquaries of the 17th c. and later (in many cases with erroneous guesses: e.g. in Blount Law. Dict. 1670, Phillips (ed. Kersey) 1706, Jamieson Sc. Dict. s. v. Trayt, etc.).

The Statute of 1266 specified three (or four) varieties of bread of fine flour, of which the standard form was the wastel (OF. gastel, F. gâteau), and three qualities of inferior bread, viz. bread of whole wheat, bread of trete, and bread of any kind of grain; the farthing loaf of trete was to weigh twice the weight of wastel, on account of the bran left in it.

Trepan, trapan (trĕ-, trăpæ·n), sb.[2] Obs. or arch. Also 7–8 trapan, (trappan). [A word of obscure and low origin, prob. originally a term of thieves' or rogues' slang. According to the known evidence, originally applied to a person in sense 1 below (quots. 1641, 1653). Thence arose the verb describing the action of such persons, Trepan v.[2], found in various constructions 1656–62. Hence, finally, a second use of the sb. as a name of the action, 1665, sense 2 here. The earlier spelling of the sb. was trapan, probably formed in some way from TRAP sb.[1] or v.[1] The change to trepan, seen first in the vb., may have been due to association with TREPAN v.[1] (a much earlier and well known word), of which TREPAN v.[2] may have been supposed to be some sort of fig. application.

No F. trapan or trapaner in this sense is recognized by Littré, Hatz.-Darm., Cotgrave, Godefroy. Nor is there any reason to connect trapan with OProv. trapan 'sorte de piège', nor with It. trapèzione = TRAPAN n.[1]

1. A person who entraps or decoys others into actions or positions which may be to his advantage or to their ruin or loss. Also applied to an animal (quot. 1686).

Generally conjectured either to be identical with OF. and AF. tret, variant of trait act of drawing, draught, etc. (see Trait), or to represent OF. treite a draught..a transportation, vent outward, shipping ouer; and an Imposition vpon commodities exported, or so transported' (Cotgr.): cf. These senses of the Fr., It., and med.L. words do not satisfactorily explain the commercial use of tret in Eng.; but it is possible that the term may have originated in connexion with a single class of commodities or of transactions, and have been extended by 1670 to others. (This is the explanation given by the majority of those who answered a query as to this word in the Pall Mall Gazette of 5 Jan. 1914. Two of these, Mr. R. H. Macaulay, M.A., and Mr. C. B. Lacey, both resident in India in 1888, remember the word as there used in this sense. Several other explanations were suggested, e.g. that tray was for F. trier to pick out.)

Tri- (trai, occas. tri), prefix, a. L. tri- and Gr. τρι-, combining form of τρεῖς, τρεῖς three, τρίς thrice.

The i, etymologically short in Greek and Latin, was in Latin sometimes lengthened, esp. in numerals (trīcēni, trīgintā, etc.). In Eng. it is now usually long and diphthongal (ai), except in derivatives before two consonants, as triple, triptych, also in trilogy, trimester. In scientific books tri- is often expressed by the numeral, as 3-bracteate, 3-carbon.

III. 5. In Chemical nomenclature, in the names of compounds and derivatives, with general sense 'three', 'three times'.

a. Prefixed to names of compounds of elements, radicals, or groups, names of salts, etc., to signify three atoms, groups, or equivalents of these elements or radicals in combination with another element or radical; e.g. tribromide, a compound of 3 atoms of bromine with another element or radical, as tribromide of boron; trisulphate, a compound of three $SO_4$ groups with a metal or radical (or in earlier nomenclature of three $SO_3$ groups with a basic oxide). So trichloride, -cyanide, -fluoride, -hydride, -iodide, -oxide, -sulphide (-sulphuret); triacetate, -carbonate, -chlorate, -cyanate, -hydrate, -phosphate, -thionate, etc. Also in names of some organic compounds, referring to their composition, as TRIAMIDE, TRIAMINE, and the compound ethers or esters of glycerin with acids, as TRIACETIN, tributyrin, -palmitin, -stearin, etc. See also TRISILICATE.

In early nomenclature, tri- or tris- prefixed to the name of a salt meant 3 molecules not of the acid, but of the base; thus 3 PbO, $C_4H_2O_8$ was called tris- or tri-acetate of lead; similarly $B_2O$ was called trixide of any element B. 1828 HENRY Elem. Chem. I. 591 Triphosphate of Iron. 1829 DAUBENY Atomic Theory (ed. 2) 112 When the number of proportionals of base is 2, the prefix di or dis is adopted; when 3, tris; when four, tetrakis...*tri*silicate of iron, 3 of base to 1 of silicic acid. 1860 SCOFFERN Orr's Circle of Sciences, Chem. (new ed.) 467 The most important is the tris or triacetate [of lead]. 1886 FOWNES Chem. (ed. 6) 607 Three compounds of stearic acid with glycerin..which M. Berthelot distinguishes as monostearin, bistearin, and tristearin. 1863–72 WATTS Dict. Chem. I. 895 The metals which form trichlorides are antimony, arsenic, bismuth, gold, molybdenum, thallium, vanadium, and probably indium. 1866 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. xvi. 142 Arsenic unites with chlorine, bromine, and iodine, to form arsenic trichloride, tribromide, and triiodide. Ibid. xxiv. 207 Metallic antimony occurs native, but its chief ore is the trisulphide.

b. Prefixed to adjs., or to sbs. used attrib., in the names or descriptions of acids, alcohols, compound ethers or esters, oxides, salts, etc.; e.g. trisodic or trisodium, (a salt) containing 3 atoms of sodium; triethylic or triethyl (a compound) containing 3 ethyl groups. So trihydric or tri-hydrogen, tricalcic or tricalcium, triargentic or tri-silver, tricarbon, trichloric, trimethylic or trimethyl, triplumbic, trithionic, triacetic, etc.

1866 ODLING Anim. Chem. 108 We meet with still less oxidised tricarbon molecules. 1869 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. xv. 154 The three atoms of hydrogen in trihydrogen phosphate may be replaced by three different metals. 1873 WATTS Fownes' Chem. 340 A trisodic orthophosphate, sometimes called subphosphate. Ibid. 451 Triplumbic tetroxide, or Red lead. 1888 MUIR & MORLEY Watts' Dict. Chem. I. 99 Alcohols are dihydric, trihydric, tetrahydric, according to the number of hydroxyl-groups which they contain.

c. Prefixed to the names of elements or radicals, or their combining forms (as azo-, bromo-, chloro-, hydro-, hydroxy-, iodo-, nitro-, oxy-, sulpho-, thio-: see these) entering into the name of a compound, to signify that three atoms or groups of the element or radical are present, or are substituted for hydrogen, in the substance designated by the rest of the name: as tribromobenzene, $C_6H_3Br_3$, in which three of the hydrogen atoms of benzene, $C_6H_6$, are replaced by three bromine atoms; so trimethylbenzene, $C_6H_3(CH_3)_3$; triethylcarbinol, $C(C_2H_5)_3OH$; trimethylamine, $N(CH_3)_3$; trichlorhydrin, $C_3H_5Cl_3$; so tribromhydrin, etc. Combinations of this kind are formed when wanted, and are unlimited in number: only a few are mentioned in this work: see TRIBROM-, TRICHLOR-, etc.

d. In verbs and their pples. derived from sbs. as in a, as tribromination, trichlorination, in which three hydrogen atoms have been replaced by atoms of bromine or chlorine; trihydrated, containing three molecules of water.

1887 MILLER Elem. Chem. III. 47 Trichlorinated Dutch Liquid. 1868 Trihydrated: see TRIHYDRATE.

IV. 6. Forming verbs (and derivatives), as TRI-FALLOW, TRISECT, TRISECTION, q. v.

Tribasic (trəibēˈsik), a. Chem. [f. Gr. τρι-, TRI- + βάσ-ις base + -IC.] Having three bases.

1. Of an acid: Having the property of exchanging three atoms of hydrogen for three of potassium or sodium, and thus forming a salt; e.g. phosphoric acid, $H_3PO_4$, which reacts with sodium hydroxide, NaOH, forming trisodium phosphate, $Na_3PO_4$. Of a salt: Containing three molecules of the basic oxide; e. g. tribasic lead acetate.

In the first half of the 19th c., the acid oxide was considered to be the acid itself (not as now when acid means the compound of this oxide with water), and tribasic acid was applied to an oxide which united with three equivalents of base to form a salt: hence the name.

The later tribe may have been f. L. tribus on the usual pattern of derivatives from L. sbs. in -us.

L. tribus is usually explained from tri- three and the verbal root bhu, bu, fu to be. It is thought by some to be cognate with Welsh tref town or inhabited place.

The earliest known application of tribus was to the three divisions of the early people of Rome (attributed by some to the separate Latin, Sabine, and Etruscan elements); thence it was transferred to render the Greek φυλή, and so to the Greek application of the latter to the tribes of Israel. This, from its biblical use, was the earliest use in English, the original Roman use not appearing till the 16th c.]

‖Triforium (trəifō·rĭŭm). Arch. Pl. -ia. [med.(Anglo-)L., found first in Gervase of Canterbury, c 1185; then, from him, in Battely's ed. of Somner Antiquities of Canterbury, 1703. In these, referring only to Canterbury Cathedral; in current English use, and in reference to cathedrals generally, only since 1800. Mentioned by Viollet-le-Duc, Dict. d'Architecture 1868, as introduced into architectural nomenclature by the English archæologists. Etymology unknown: see Note below.] A gallery or arcade in the wall over the arches at the sides of the nave and choir, and sometimes of the transepts, in some large churches. Originally applied to that in Canterbury Cathedral; in the nineteenth century extended as a general term.
[c 1185 GERVASE (of Canterbury) Tract. de Combust. et Reparat. Cant. Eccl. Wks. (Rolls) I. 13 Hic murus chorum circuiens in circinatione illa pilastrorum in ampite ecclesiæ in unum convenient. Eng.*, etc. 93 Above them [pointed arches] are the triforia, continued through every part. 1848 Builder 8 July 328/2 A discourse was..delivered by Prof. Willis, on the triforium of ancient churches..The only ancient work in which such a term could be found..was a history of Canterbury (by Gervase), in which it occurred in three places... He [Willis] verily believed that the modern term was a clumsy latinization of 'thoroughfarium'. 1868 (A. K. H. BOYD Less. Mid. Age 368 The nave [at Norwich], of fourteen bays, vaulted in stone, and with the heavy round arches of the triforium as large as those below, makes the choir, of four bays, ending in a pentagon, seem small in comparison. 1894 PARKER Goth. Archit. 519 The term triforium ..is often used, not of the arcade, but of the space at the back of the arcade. So that it means sometimes the triforium arcade, sometimes the triforium chamber.
[Note. On the face of it, triforium looks like a normal L. formation (cf. tricennium, triennium, trifinium, trifurcium) from tri- three or three + fores 'a door of two leaves' = 'something consisting of or containing three doors'. Hence it has been explained as referring to a gallery or arcade with triple openings, as found at Amiens and in some other cathedrals; but this is not the case in Canterbury cathedral, to which alone the term was applied down to 1800, so that the explanation is not consistent with the facts. Others have suggested formation from L. forāre to bore, pierce, with tri- for F. tres, L. trans. Various other conjectures have been offered (see e.g. N. & Q. series 2, vol. IV. 269, 320, 371, 481; series 7, V. 57, etc.) but none of them are satisfactory. The word itself may have been erroneously formed or misapplied by Gervase: see also med.L. triforium in the sense 'border, ornamental bordering' in Du Cange.]

Trillion (tri·lyən). [= F. trillion (N. Chuquet, c 1484), It. trillione, from the stem of million with substitution of tri-: cf. billion.] The third power of a million; a million billions, i. e. millions of millions. (In France and local U.S., a thousand 'billions', i. e. an English billion: see Billion.)

The terms billion, trillion, quadrillion, etc., up to nonillion, are explained by N. Chuquet, in his Triparty de la Science des Nombres (fl. 2 r) printed in Bullettino di Bibliografia e di Storia delle Scienze Matematiche XIII. 593 (Roma 1880); also in the Arismetique of Ét. de la Roche, 1520. Both of these early writers explain billion, trillion, etc. as successive powers of a million, the trillion being the third power of a million, 'a million of millions of millions', as always used in England. According to Littré, it was only in the middle of the 17th c. that the erroneous custom was established of dividing series of figures above a million into groups of three, and calling a thousand millions a billion, and a million millions a trillion, an entire perversion of the nomenclature of Chuquet and De la Roche, an error unfortunately followed by some in the United States.

Trim, a. (adv.) Forms: 6– trim; also 6 Sc. trume, trvme; trym, trymme, tryme; 6–7 trimme, 7 trimm, trimn. [History obscure. OE. had an adj. trum, 'firm, stable, strong, sound, robust' (not known in the cognate langs.); whence also in prehistoric time the vb. trum-jan*, OE. trymman, TRIM v. No example of trum is known after OE. times, but the negatives untrum infirm and untrumnesse infirmity survived to c 1200–1225. Afterwards, like TRIM v., the adj. disappears till after 1500. The modern adj. trim does not answer in form, nor directly in sense, to trum; but in both it goes with the verb. It would appear therefore to be a deriv. of the verb (or, if both came down in ME., to have been conformed to the verb).]

In many early quotations it is difficult or impossible to infer the exact sense intended. Cf. TRIM a.

Trim (trɪm), v. Inf. trimmed, -ing. Forms: (i trymman, trymian, treman), 6 trymme, tryme, (treme), trym, 6–7 trimme, 6– trim, (7 trime). [The existing senses of this verb begin early in the 16th c. Before 1550 the word had become exceedingly common in nearly all its chief senses. OE. had a verb trymman or trymian :—trumjan* to make firm or strong, strengthen, confirm, set (a force) in array, settle, arrange, etc., f. OE. trum adj. firm, strong, sound, steadfast, stable, etc. So far as the form is concerned, trymman, trymian would naturally become tryan, trim by 1500; the sense 'make fit, make ready, prepare, fit out' might also arise out of the OE. The difficulty is that not one certain example of the verb in any sense is known during the Middle English period, and that it comes upon the scene in the 16th c., like a new word, quickly laid hold of to supply many needs. But as no other source is known, it is generally held that trim is identical with the OE. trymman, and that the verb (perh. along with TRIM a.), must have been preserved in spoken use, or in some dialect, for four centuries, without appearing in the extant literature.

OE. had also the compounds getrymman to confirm, strengthen, encourage, also intr. (for refl.) to grow strong, gain or recover strength, and betrymian to beset with a force, besiege, environ, with 2 examples as late as c 1225 (see BITRUM); Genesis & Exodus, c 1250, has also two instances of a vb. trim-en to 'be pregnant, conceive', or perhaps to 'give birth'; but none of these show any approach to the modern senses. The OE. senses and that in Gen. & Ex. are here prefixed as possibly bearing upon the later history.]

I. (Only OE.) †1. trans. To make firm or strong; to strengthen, confirm; to give as security; to arm or array (a force); to settle, arrange; to encourage, comfort, exhort.

A formative denoting that three nitro-groups, $NO_2$, have replaced three hydrogen atoms in the substance designated by the rest of the name, the nitrogen atoms being directly joined to carbon atoms; e. g. trinitrophenol or picric acid, $C_6H_2(NO_2)_3(OH)$, in which three H atoms of phenol have been replaced by three $NO_2$ groups, the N atoms directly joined to three C atoms. So trinitrocresol, $C_6H(CH_3)(OH)(NO_2)_3$, from cresol; trinitronaphthalene, $C_{10}H_5(NO_2)_3$, from naphthalene, $C_{10}H_8$, etc. Also attrib., as tri-nitro carbolic acid.

1891 J. Yrnl. Chem. Soc. III. 75 A third compound is formed, in which 3 eq. of hydrogen are replaced by hypo-nitric acid: this is Trinitranilsol. 1899 ROSCOE Elem. Chem. xxxix. 381 Tri-nitro-phenol [1866, xxxix. 336 tri-nitro carbolic acid] or picric acid, is a bright yellow crystalline body.

b. In earlier nomenclature, trinitro- included cases in which the nitrogen atoms of the $NO_2$ groups were attached by oxygen atoms to the carbon atoms of the substance designated by the rest of the name; such compounds are now called TRINITRATES; e. g. trinitroglycerin, $C_3H_5(O.NO_2)_3$ (also TRINITRIN), now called glyceryl trinitrate. So trinitro-cellulose or guncotton, a powerful explosive, considered to be $\{C_6H_7O_2(O.NO_2)_3\}_x$, derived from cellulose, $\{C_6H_{10}O_5\}_x$, by replacement of OH groups by $O.NO_2$ groups of nitric acid, $HO.NO_2$, the molecule being some unknown multiple of the formula. (See also quot. 1910.)

-trix, suffix, ending of Latin feminine agent-nouns (with stems in -trīc-, acc. -tricem, whence Fr. -trice: see -trice), corresponding to masculines in -tor, as adjūtrix female helper, bellātrix female warrior, imperātrix female commander, empress, inventrix female discoverer, vēnātrix huntress, etc.; sometimes used adjectively, as victrix victorious, ultrix avenging. Several of these nouns were adopted in Eng., from ancient or mediæval Latin, in the 15th c. and later, as Administratrix, Consolatrix, Creatrix, Executrix, Mediatrix, Persecutrix, Testatrix, etc.; and others formed on the analogy of them, as Inheritrix, Narratrix, Perpetratrix, etc. In Geometry, words in -trix denote straight lines (linea being understood), as Bisectrix, Directrix; more rarely curves or surfaces, as Indicatrix, Tractrix. The suffix has occasionally been loosely used to form nonce-feminines to agent-nouns in -ter, as Painttrix instead of the regular paintress.
